'SUMMARYr

The subject is the delivery of the U.S. mail in a rural area. The camera was positioned in full sight of a standard rural free delivery post box located in front of a well-kept house and garden. A small boy and girl walk past the camera position in front of the mail box. At that moment, a standard rural horse-drawn postal delivery wagon comes into sight. The postman places the mail in the box, and the wagon continues on its way.r

Teaching Notes:

When talking with children about community helpers, it is important to honor the most menial of jobs, including that of a 1920's era rat catcher!

I would use this image as an observation exercise or bell ringer activity with no context or added information. How long will it take students to notice the rat?

What do our schools do to control outside invaders? My own library secretary once came to work on a Monday morning after someone in charge of a weekend event had left a garbage bag in her office to be disposed of once school was back in session. Beneath the bag, she discovered a baby rattlesnake!

Believe it or not, there's an In Custodia Legis Law Librarians of Congress blog post titled The New York City Rat's Legal History!

KIDCITIZEN COMMUNITY HELPERS EPISODE

Teaching Notes:

Download the complete Teacher's Guide and play this KidCitizen episode with your young students! The guide includes lots of outstanding Library of Congress primary sources of community helpers, superb background information, standards, and suggestions for activities in science, visual literacy, history, and critical thinking. It's also available in Spanish!

The importance of community helpers is a building block of civics understanding. In this episode, children investigate who community helpers are, and how they have changed over time through exploration of a rich photograph (from the Library of Congress) of a man delivering ice to a schoolhouse in 1899.

Children explore the photograph by revealing it in sections, observing the details they find (See), and working with in-game character Ella to figure out what jobs the helpers are doing. Children collect elements of the photograph to their journal, and use what they have collected to help them decide what the jobs are (Think), and then to connect those jobs with community helpers today (Wonder).
